About the Ghana Institute of Advanced Legal Studies (GIALS). GIALS inaugurates its new legal research centre in Accra on 18th June 2015. The Institute was founded with the express purpose of furthering human development by widening access to quality legal education, training and research and through capacity building programmes. The establishment of GIALS is motivated by the belief in the importance of having a legal think-tank and research facility whose functions would include engaging civil society and national institutions in legal policy dialogue as well as the needed research support for legislative advocacy and law reform in Ghana.

About the Institute of Advanced Legal Studies (IALS), University of London. IALS was founded in 1947 as a national shared resource to promote and facilitate research in law. Its building in Bloomsbury, London, houses one of the world's great comparative legal research libraries and each year welcomes over 6,000 researchers and scholars from the UK and overseas. It is home to specialist research centres, innovative partnerships and an active community of researchers, fellows and postgraduate students. It promotes new research agendas in specialist and interdisciplinary areas of law with direct effect on policy and practice. It provides research training and online resources, programs of seminars, lectures and workshops and is a meeting place for organizations and scholars from around the world. IALS is part of the School of Advanced Study of the University of London.
